Acting as a convenient way of sharing files, cloud based storage solutions have made inroads in the last few years. A user with an Internet connection can now use a service like CrashPlan to store files online and retrieve them if needed, while business users may opt to store their files in Dropbox. Rather than thinking about backing up your computer, the focus is now on securing documents, media files, and other essential digital assets. Cloud service users may find their workstations linked together in a remote control configuration to share their files with a partner or client. Other services allow users to sync their personal files across multiple devices to protect them from being lost or stolen. Security concerns The nature of cloud based storage gives users a sense of security for their data, which is stored in an online server and made available at all times. However, this type of backup is significantly less secure than storing the data on a local hard drive. A hacker may open a security hole in your computer and access your files without leaving a trace. Although cloud storage networks are generally safe, no service is perfect, so users should follow some simple security rules when using a cloud based service: Always use a strong password. Ideally use a complex password that includes upper and lower case characters, numbers and symbols. Always pay attention to your web browser and online banking settings, as they can have security holes that allow hackers to capture private information. Choose your file and other storage locations carefully, as some people may have a lot of sensitive data that they do not want to share with anyone. Most cloud storage services include simple encryption tools and tools to detect and remove viruses. Some offer advanced security features, such as virtual or physical servers to protect your data and redundancy in case a server goes down. How a cloud storage service works Cloud storage is mainly used to keep your files available, even if your computer crashes or is destroyed. In addition, it is great for sharing data between multiple computers. A cloud based storage system uses a remote network and web-based interface to transfer the files
