Higher malondialdehyde levels in peripheral blood mononuclear cells from epileptic children. The present study examined malondialdehyde levels in the plasma and peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMCs) in children with epilepsy and normal controls. The relation between malondialdehyde levels and polymorphisms of the gene involved in the regulation of lipid metabolism, fatty acid synthase (FASN), was also examined. Plasma and PBMC malondialdehyde levels in children with epilepsy were significantly higher than those of the controls. Genotyping of the FASN gene revealed no difference between the allelic frequency of the SNP type in children with epilepsy and the control. However, the FASN C>T genotype was significantly different between children with epilepsy and control, irrespective of gender (p=0.012). The relationship between the increase in malondialdehyde levels and the genotype for the FASN SNP indicates that children with epilepsy have excessive lipid peroxidation, which could be due to the presence of other underlying pathology.
