UPDATE I have tried this with the SDL_flac, but the problem of flac does not exist in the test, but if I use the flac I get the same problem. A: I'm getting the same error on Windows 10. If you read the bottom of the linked post above (which is linked in your question), you'll see this: The problem is that flac in general has some limitations on output settings, such as bit rate, bit depth, etc. When you have a library or ripping software that does not deal with this properly, the result is audio where you can hear clicking and crackling. The only surefire way around this is to first convert to FLAC with an FLAC-to-mp3 converter, then convert back to the original format. This seems to be the case for your audio. If you look at the specs for the libavcodec-ffmpeg.dll, you can see that it's linked with libFLAC.dll. So, you have two options: If your library really does have a problem dealing with the bit depth that you need in order to convert the file as it's being ripped, you can convert the file to FLAC with another method, and then rip to the bit depth that your library likes. You can tell the ripping software to rip to a lower bit depth. This will cut out the less noticeable crackling and clicking (at the loss of quality). If you're interested, here's the document describing the FLAC standard: Il potere della religione non esiste: «Dov'è l'anima?». Morto il soprannome insostenibile dell'«Arcivescovo della fede». Menzionato più spesso di altri di tutto il mondo e venerato anche da alcuni importanti protagonisti della teologia. Le considerazioni dell'anatema della religione esplodono qualche settimana fa sul blog di Marco Pannella, che, avendo sempre condiviso la ferma convinzione che esista una dimensione interiore dell'uomo non possa che confermare la sua conoscenza all'interno: «Lo 0cc13bf012
