The present invention relates generally to a method for enhancing the sensitivity of a magnetoresistive detector and more particularly to a method for enhancing the sensitivity of a GMR (Giant Magneto-Resistive) detector. The development of a magnetoresistive or giant magneto-resistive read head or transducer or sensing element will put a potentially large volume of information bearing media within the range of current sensing. Currently available media that offer enough signal to noise to be sensed include magnetic recording and the products of current technology. For example, hard disk drives have been successful for many years in storing large amounts of information on magnetic media. Disk drives have reached several gigabytes of storage on each of these devices. The normal operating life of a disk is about ten years. Magnetoresistive heads have been able to successfully read these disks, but more precise read heads with a greater track density are needed in order to produce disks with a greater storage capacity. Optical storage media has been available for many years as a storage medium for computer data storage. These disks have an optical medium and a relatively large number of pits that represent data. The disk, however, typically fails after about one million cycles. The relative potential of magnetoresistive heads has not been fully recognized due to the complexity of the technology and the need for large silicon based heads. Know what's insane? That a lot of people now own not one, but two, three, and four houses. "Not impossible," you say. "I've seen it happen." Maybe. What we're dealing with is the combination of the "hurry up and settle down" ethos of the Baby Boomer generation and the availability of subprime mortgages. As a result, homeownership became the thing you wished for. You spent your whole life saving and scrimping for your first mortgage, and then when you got that first one, you' 0cc13bf012
