This motion data will replace the existing human player model as a unit, much like FIFA 17's "player 2." The player model that will become an AI-powered composite of all the players that are on the field will replace the real-life players as units. This concept will apply to most of the various aspects of gameplay that will influence a real-life player's performance on the pitch. Teams will now have a lot more say in how players move throughout the game, no more running on players, controlling players and controlling opposition defences as it is being done in FIFA 17.

The football AI will become more intelligent, and will act at the speed of the game. Attacking teams will use movement to get into advanced positions, and can execute better counter-press and off-the-ball actions. If possession is maintained, then the player can use their skills to dominate and create chances. The top team will be expected to dominate and control the game. Lower teams will have to control the game to avoid being overpowered and losing in order to gain a positive result. FIFA 22 will have a very good goalkeeper that might be able to stop a shot, but will not be able to stop the ball from hitting the net. The new game engine will reward players with accuracy and close-range finishing, and will reward strikers with more space and opportunities to shoot. Accuracy and speed will become a key component in every aspect of gameplay, and players will need to vary their movement patterns and strike speeds. The DLS game engine is being re-developed, with more of an emphasis on realistic player movement and crowd connection, for the game's launch in September. Since the addition of "AI and intelligence into our game's artificial intelligence are more realistic and will create challenges for players," the FIFA community have been waiting for an official release date. After spending four years developing FIFA 22 and upgrading its game engine, the developers are ready to release FIFA 22 in 2017. How does FIFA 22's new game engine work? The FIFA 2K game engine is being re-developed, with more of an emphasis on realistic player movement and crowd connection, for the game's launch in September. As a result of this, the developers are ready to introduce more authenticity to the game, and have made changes to their game engine based on player feedback. "We also upgraded the game's core engine, and it
