It is predicted that the effect of CXCL10 haplotypes on the outcome of HBV-HCV co-infected individuals would be modified by RAR genotype. Therefore, we also need to include CXCL10-SNP haplotypes in the analysis. In conclusion, this paper shows that higher levels of CXCL10 in the serum of HCV infected patients (compared to anti-HCV-negative controls) are associated with HBV-HCV co-infection. Based on their location within the RAR gene, three SNP haplotypes which could modulate the outcome of the disease, can be grouped into two pairs, each related to a promoter region. A group of individuals with the 32,3 and 15,3C haplotypes is associated with having higher levels of CXCL10 in the serum than the remaining haplotypes. The association between CXCL10 and the RAR alleles is not modified by gender or presence of anti-HBs. [^1]: Competing Interests:The authors have declared that no competing interests exist.
