relates to a method of producing a starting material containing the elements titanium, tungsten, titanium and oxygen, and the starting material to be used in the method. It is well known that titanium is a material which is used in a wide variety of fields as a structural material, an alloy material and a catalyst. As conventional methods of producing titanium, there are known, for example, the Dewar process, the Kroll process, the reductive or oxidation process and the flux process.
Among these methods, the flux process has been frequently used as a method of producing titanium from titanium tetrachloride ( $\text{TiCl}_4$ ) in the practical industry.
Generally, in the flux process, a reductant (e.g., carbon, a hydrogen gas, hydrogenation alumina, iron or a mixture thereof, or a mixture of any of them with titanium tetrachloride) is added to  $\text{TiCl}_4$  in a reactor so that the  $\text{TiCl}_4$  is reduced to titanium having a high purity and forming titanium trichloride. For example, when iron is used as a reductant and iron and titanium tetrachloride are fed into a reactor through a steam line at 10 K/sec. and 1 K/sec., respectively, and steam is blown into the reactor at a rate of 5.5 K/sec., an amount of iron fed into the reactor per unit time becomes 1.8 gm-

Fe/min.  $TiCl_4$  undergoes chlorination to produce titanium trichloride. In this reaction, the iron reacts with  $TiCl_4$  to form iron titanium hydride ( $FeTiHCl_2$ ), and iron titanium chloride. The amount of the iron titanium hydride is increased in accordance with the amount of Fe fed to the reactor. When the iron titanium hydride is produced, a hydrochloric gas is generated in accordance with the reduction reaction of iron with  $TiCl_4$ . Accordingly, as a matter of course, the iron titanium hydride is reacted with moisture and hydrogen so as to be converted into iron and titanium dioxide. The iron titanium oxide produced in this manner includes iron and titanium oxides. Iron titanium oxide has a function as a catalyst for the reaction between Ti d0c515b9f4
