.Q: Why are LogFiles written to differen directories? Why are the logs kept in the different directory, rather than one directory where they should be? There is this issue logged on the Apache forums. I have a server where by default the logs are going to C:/Apache/Apache2.2.29/Logs, and after running out of disk space, I get this error: Logfile "C:/Apache/Apache2.2.29/Logs/error.log" not found or does not exist Any idea why or how to fix it? A: You may need to check your permissions. Set the permissions on the root of your Apache installation to the same permissions as the original C:\Apache\Apache2.2.29\Logs, which would be 775. Then the logs will be written to C:\Apache\Apache2.2.29\Logs and the files will be hidden. For more information, see: A: Apache doesn't create any log files. It "writes" logs by periodically calling the underlying operating system's facilities. They're all under the directory you specified. For example, if the logs were in the directory /var/log/apache2, then the underlying calls would be to the function log_create_file("/var/log/apache2/error.log"). You can write your own custom log handlers to intercept the calls and then intercept the call to write the log information to wherever you'd like. In case you don't have enough disk space, then Apache (for one) will write out an error-level (5) message to stderr; and in case of a minor error, it will write out a message to stderr (even though the error should actually be written to a log file). But since those are "real" (system-provided) calls to the underlying os, then to prevent them from happening too often, Apache will not create any log file - there should never be any need to create a log file, since Apache is going to write the error messages to its own logs.
